Alas, the times have changed. A day came when the anthorities suddenly became austers and refused admittance to the garden to the ladies of questionable character. The gardens lost their attraction and in this City that if they wish to roturn home, and I were no longer crowded to the students in their hours of leisure. Then came the rebellion, when the Vandals burned the suburbs, devastated the palace, overthrew the gardens and massacred or carried off the population, and after them came the Imperial army who in their victory did what they could with the materials left them to imitate the work of their predecessors. Now the fairly good condition, but their attraction has disappeared; the reign of the hetairi is finished. and only a few inquisitive wanderers occasionally visit these haunts of past delights. The gardens of China are as childish as the people who invented them. The general appearance is pleasing, and one is astonished to see how much can be not into such a small space. One supposes at first sight the garden to be much larger than it really is, thanks to the winding paths and serpentine galleries which one is forced to follow. The first garden which we visited was the Chon Chang Yuan, the Garden of the Easy Administration. It is situated a short distance from the point where one disembarked. and is entered from the road alongside the canal which traverses the city from east to west. It is one of the largest and best cared for. At the entrance one has to pay 12 cash, which charge is made to assist in keeping the graden in order and to make the company more select. There are many kiosks with marble tables, and pavilions filled with curiosities. A slab of marble from Ta-li Fu in Yunnan, the weins of which represent landscapes, was purchased at Shanghai with the ticket of the foreign seller still strached, foreign olocks, Japanese lacquer, &c., &c. In the centre of a small pond there is a kiosque of elegant construction approached by four bridges. On the front one reads the inscription, "the performs of the lotus is exhaled on all sides " and on many of the other buildings there are inscriptions of a grave or witty description.

On the other side of the canal is the Shih well repays a visit. During the Mongol dynasty there was a small temple on this site. where a priest learned in the law instructed the faithful The Emperor Kang Hei paid him several visits. This garden is also called the Garden of Five Pines. Following the road parallel to the capal one reaches the Tien Hon Kung. Palace of the Queen of Heaven. The Queen of Heaven or the Celestial Mother of Good Omen is a Buildhistic divinity. The statue of the goddess is placed under glass. It represents a great woman with eight arms, of which two hold in the air emblems of the sun and moon. On each side are statues of hideous appearance, painted in bright colours, which seem to serve as her guard of honour. In front of the alter were three pervendor of perfume, candles, and small sticks of inpense. A quarter of an hour's walk brings us to the Pei-sien-ta or Pagoda of the Temple of the North. This is one of the most beautiful Pagodas of China. It has nine stories, and strange to say is almost perfect. It seems to have been respected alike by the rebels and the Imperialists, who usually made short work of all monuments. By way of contrast the large temple and the monastery suffered severely in the siege of 1863 and remain at present as they were then left. For a few cash an old priest broken down by age and the austerities of his order opened for us the door of the Pagoda and we entered accompanied by several provincials who wished to have a look at Socohow from a height, as our people like to view Paris from the towers of Notre Dame or the column of the Place Ven-The stair has two hundred and eighteen

At our feet lies a vast sea of varnished tiles and ourved roofs and carious buildings, smidst which are seen the flagataffs of the Yamens with their long streamers floating in the breeze and several small pagodas, insignificant beside ours. Here and there small cases of verdure break the monotony of the landscape, while our sees not a few desert spots filled with masses of broken bricks and tiles. This is truly an immonse city, with its gardens, its grass lawns and its rains. Close to the ramparts, especially towards the south, are vast spaces govered with the débris of houses and palaces, living, or at least existing, monuments
